

On September 8, Cricket Australia (CA) announced that they've decided to push ahead with the privatisation process.

Alex Malcolm and Andrew McGlashan outlined the situation on Cricinfo, which you can read here.

The ACA continues to believe that privatisation could deliver positive outcomes for Australian cricket, provided the right deal is in place to maximise long-term value for the game and players.

As it stands, the ACA have not reached any agreement with CA on a new MOU, and we remain a long way apart.

A key disconnect with CA relates to differing views on whether any proceeds from privatisation would be captured in Australian Cricket Revenue (ACR) and therefore whether players would receive their normal 27.5% share of these proceeds.

The ACA have received legal and expert advice which states that players would receive a share of any proceeds and that CA cannot proceed without our agreement in any event. CA have a different view.

The ACA's Position

The ACA's position remains unchanged. We support privatisation in principle, but only if the final arrangements deliver a fair outcome for players and strengthen Australian cricket over the long term. At present, significant issues remain unresolved and we will continue working with CA to address them.
